Weekly Insight

“Don’t hesitate to get in touch with people from the past. Former colleagues or classmates will have a “frozen in time” view of you from when you worked or went to school together. Even if your sense of self has diminished over time, they don’t know anything about that. They remember you as you were”

New Year...New Job?

What's your New Year's resolution? Is this the year for you to relaunch your career?

By Mary Beth Barrett-Newman

What do you need to do to find that new opportunity? Is there a gap between the type of position you're interested in and your current skills? Maybe you're not sure. Certainly, having a solid resume that focuses on your quantifiable accomplishments and a robust LinkedIn profile are important tools, but what else is required? Again, look at those online job postings. Do you have the education, certifications, software and/or systems knowledge required? If not, should you take classes or acquire certifications to acquire these? The best way to find out the true answer is to start talking to people that are currently working in the field, industry or position you're targeting. You want to spend your time and money investing in areas that employers truly value.

And what about networking? The percentage of people who find a new position through networking is significantly higher than those who blindly apply online with no one championing them internally. Set a networking plan in place – reach out to one or two (or more) people a week, join some industry groups where you can meet others in your field, participate online via blogs and social media like Twitter and LinkedIn. Share information, relevant articles and become a trusted resource for others. Get your name out there.

Just like losing 10 lbs. by increasing exercise and incorporating a healthy diet, successfully relaunching your career can be accomplished by assessing “why” you want to return to work, “what” you need to get there and “networking” your way to that new position.
